“Jmahl really helped me through my drug addiction by completely ignoring every single red flag, every desperate cry for help, and every time I nodded off mid-conversation. What a legend. Rest in peace, you beautiful enabler—you somehow made rock bottom feel like a group activity. He also helped both of us navigate our tumultuous marriages by offering the kind of wise counsel that mostly consisted of ‘damn, that’s crazy’ and changing the subject to whatever sports game was on. Truly a pillar of emotional support, if that pillar was made of wet spaghetti and zero follow-through. Jmahl had a rare gift: the ability to watch two people spiral into chaos and respond with the enthusiasm of a man reading the back of a shampoo bottle. His silence was golden, mostly because it meant he wasn’t actively making things worse, which, let’s be honest, was his love language. We’ll miss the way he’d show up exactly when we didn’t need him, offer advice that aged like milk, and then disappear right before the consequences hit. A true friend through thick and... well, mostly the thick fog of bad decisions. Rest in peace, Jmahl. Thanks for doing absolutely the bare minimum and somehow still being unforgettable. The bar was in hell and you still managed to limbo under it with style. We’ll never forget you—mostly because therapy is expensive.”
